

How to Increase the Impact of Your Life and Nurture Future Generations

— Ron Ross —

Baseball legend Jackie Robinson said, “A life isn’t significant except for its impact on others’ lives.” Following are ten ways to increase the impact of your life and nurture future generations:

First, be approachable: Make others feel accepted and welcome in your presence.

Second, be thoughtful: Ask yourself, “What does the other person need from me?” Once you discern your answer, respond appropriately.

Third, be believable: Tell the truth with gentleness and respect.

Fourth, be comprehensible (keep it simple): Education can make you smart, but making things simple requires wisdom.

Fifth, be dependable: Your words and deeds must always match. The opposite of dependability is instability.

Sixth, be honorable: “Who sows virtue reaps honor.” Leonardo da Vinci

Seventh, be truthful: “Honesty is the first chapter in the book of wisdom.” — Thomas Jefferson

Eighth, be prayerful: Bathe with prayer every conversation with someone you love.

Ninth, be lovable: “If you would be loved, love AND be loveable.”— Benjamin Franklin

Tenth, be intentional: Plan times and ways to influence others — then take action.

No stage in life is more suited for nurturing than grandparenthood. Why? Because seniors know how difficult and rewarding life can be, they’ve lived it. The easiest way to enrich and inspire your offspring is to tell them true stories from your life. Everyone loves a good story — give it a try.

Remember: Love never dies — neither should your stories.

For more information on how to leave a legacy of love through stories of your life,

visit www.LegacyStoryCourse.com

LEGACY STORY COURSE

It's time to tell your story!